ABRAHAM LINCOLN AS HE LOOKED FOUR DAYS BEFORE THE GETTYSBURG ADDRESS

The portrait of Lincoln, shown above, is an enlargement of a rare photograph. Copies of this enlargement, framed in dark oak, 32 by 38 inches, have been presented to the 28 branches and reading rooms of the Boston public library by the president of the library trustees, and each frame bears a small brass plate, with this inscription:

"GIVEN BY JOSIAH H. BENTON, FEBRUARY 12, 1909."

The following interesting account of the taking of the photograph is given by Noah Brooks in his "Washington in Lincoln's Time":

"One November day—it chanced to be the Sunday before the dedication of the national cemetery at Gettysburg—I had an appointment to go with the President to Gardner, the photographer, on 7th st., to fulfill a long-standing engagement. Mr. Lincoln carefully explained that he could not go on any other day without interfering with the public business and the photographer's business, to say nothing of his inability to be hindered by courtesy seekers and other seekers on the way thither."

"Just as we were going down the stairs of the White House the President suddenly remembered that he needed a cap, and, after hurrying back to his office, soon returned with a long envelope in his hand. When we were fairly started on our way, he said that the envelope was an advance copy of Edward Everett's address to be delivered at the Gettysburg dedication. . . . Drawing it out I saw that it was a one-page supplement to a Boston paper and that Mr. Everett's address was already covered both sides of the sheet. In the picture which the President gave me, the envelope containing Mr. Everett's oration is seen on the table by the side of the artist."
